

Overheard at a Kraft Boardroom Lunch. Part Two.

"Marty, I want you to handle this Select Committee thing in London, OK? It's no big deal and they sure as hell ain't gonna stop us following through on our post-acquisition strategy. But these Brit MPs love to set up a Select Committee to ask a lot of damn fool questions, if they think their voters are getting tee-ed off. There'll be maybe ten guys - Members of their Parliament, right - asking you dumb questions. You don't have to worry about their questions because these guys are none too smart and in any event they don't know what they're talking about. When you get over there, you wanna take a look at the TV programme from the BBC called Parliament Today. You'll see what I mean. What a bunch of jerks! Better yet, none of these Select Committees ever publish their results.

But you gotta remember two things. Very important. Firstly, don't even hint at further redundancies. And sure as hell not the 4,500 we got lined up for the UK. Understood? Good. And try and be kinda nice about their brand - they treat it like it was God, and we don't want that crazy Lord or their goddam Prime Minister getting up and making things noisy, because we at Kraft think it's just another choc-bar. Got it? Yeah, I know you were going off to the Caribbean but, sorry, some other time.